Dear friends,

As we look back on our work over the course of the year, it is impossible not to acknowledge the life-altering impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on our communities across Washington, the country, and, indeed, the world. As a health care organization that largely supports the direct provision of care, we were fortunate to quickly move to a remote work environment without missing a beat. While we all experienced the long months of community losses, stress, and anxiety, our organization proved to be highly resilient and more valuable than ever to our community stakeholders. Our staff served our members, providers, and communities with compassion and devotion to our mission, including their outreach to nearly 100,000 members to provide assistance for their increased needs created by the pandemic.

Our network of Community Health Centers (CHCs) and other essential providers were nothing short of heroic in responding to communities disproportionately affected by COVID and its wake. We were honored to support their work in whatever ways we could – whether it was helping with food distribution, educating patients about testing sites, or supporting providers’ shift to telehealth services. Our aim was to provide services and funding so that community needs were met. We were especially sensitive to the increasing needs for our behavioral health partners’ services and took early action to support their transition to telehealth services and their financial stability.

The reality of racism as a threat to public health was laid bare by the glaring racial disparities in the numbers of cases, hospitalizations, and deaths from COVID-19. These disparities, along with the very visible displays of racial injustice by the criminal justice system brought clarity to our collective responsibility to address racial and social injustice. I have often said that advancing health equity is the very reason for our organization’s existence. The toll this past year has taken on our communities focuses our mission even more acutely.

We strive to actively make a difference in addressing head-on the inequities that impact the health of our members and their communities. Working with partners across the State of Washington and beyond, we are seeking to make progress together. We continued our work with the Immigrant and Refugee Health Alliance, which was formed with our CHC and community partners to address these populations’ particular barriers in our state. We are in the second year of the Advancing Health Equity initiative, a partnership between CHPW, CHNW health centers, and the Health Care Authority, as part of a national learning collaborative. Staff also began participation in the Disparities Leadership Program, a national cohort led by Mass General Hospital and Harvard Medical School, designed to help health care leaders achieve equity in a time of health care transformation.

Sometimes the amount of work ahead for achieving our vision of an equitable and just system seems daunting. But, when we look back on 2020 and the work that we have done with our community partners, we are energized by the strength, adaptability, and resilience that underlies our progress and look forward to a brighter future ahead.

Our Vision

The vision of Community Health Plan of Washington (CHPW) is to provide services and support that improve the health and well-being of our members, both directly and through our valued partnerships with community-based providers. We meet this challenge by identifying and addressing needs that impact the health of our members, both within the clinical setting and beyond.

For many behavioral health providers, the advanced funds enabled them to stay afloat financially so they could continue to serve members dealing with mental and emotional stressors like COVID, anxiety, isolation, and job loss, as well as support continuity in medications and other therapies.

“As part of our work to deliver whole-person care, we are committed to ensuring that communities across the state receive the behavioral health support that they need,” said Dr. Paul Sherman, CHPW’s Chief Medical Officer. “By rapidly advancing funding early in the pandemic, we helped BH providers remain open – a tangible demonstration of the power of community.”

CHPW took a myriad of additional steps to ensure the availability of access to medical and behavioral care across the state. They included:

• Creating flexible telehealth billing policies for providers early in the pandemic
• Convening regional forums with behavioral health providers to share resources and collaborate around patients’ needs
• Helping members with expanded prescription delivery options for many of the medicines they needed most
• Expanding meal delivery services for members in need and in quarantine due to COVID-19
• Easing or lifting providers’ credentialing and preauthorization notification requirements and expediting the credentialing of temporary providers

Responding to the Pandemic: CHPW Goes Above and Beyond

The COVID-19 pandemic ushered in a cascade of health care challenges that tested the mettle of our organization. Could we continue to efficiently deliver accessible care to our members during an emerging health crisis, the likes of which we had never seen in our lifetimes? Could we find new ways to support our providers, many of whom were struggling financially due to temporary closures and lost patient revenue?

Through stalwart innovation, plain hard work, and selfless dedication, we responded with a resounding “Yes!” We proved time and again to our community partners, our care providers, and our plan members: You are not alone.

CHPW advanced $25 million in additional payments to Community Health Centers and behavioral health providers to help cover anticipated lost revenue during the evolving pandemic.
CHPW also partnered with several Community Health Centers to inform residents in their communities about COVID testing and availability of care services. We sent text messages in multiple languages to Apple Health members with reminders of CHPW’s 24/7 Nurse Advice Line, their mental health benefits, cellphone benefit, and social service resources.

To further improve member access to care, we quickly launched a 24/7 telehealth service that kept members connected to providers day or night. The new service gave members the option to confer with a doctor by phone or video – without having to leave the safety of their home. We also supported our Community Health Centers in ramping up their telehealth services, keeping members connected to their trusted local clinics.

Checking in on members

On the home front, CHPW employees began a prolonged period of working remotely due to COVID health restrictions. As we asked each other, “Are you OK?” we also began checking on our members.

Employees in departments across the organization—Customer Service, Sales & Marketing, Health Services—called nearly 100,000 Medicare and Medicaid members to check on their well-being. That was virtually every CHPW member for whom we had a phone number. We assured them that they were not alone and offered whatever help we could provide.

Many members expressed profound gratitude for the call. Some said our reassuring voice was one of the few—and sometimes only—outside contacts they had received up to that point in the pandemic. One customer service representative summed up the reaction from one appreciative member this way: “She was so grateful that we were worried about HER and her family and how she never felt like just a number with CHPW.”

Staying healthy during a difficult time

As 2020 drew to a close and with COVID infections still raging, CHPW hosted a virtual panel to share mental health advice and resources with Washingtonians on coping with the pandemic. CHPW Senior Behavioral Dr. Sherman and Dr. Terry Lee, CHPW Senior Behavioral Health Director, joined Blake Edwards, Behavioral Health Director at Columbia Valley Community Health, in the online panel discussion and listener Q&A.

Advancing Health Equity in the Community

One of CHPW’s tenets is that every person deserves access to affordable health care, regardless of their background or circumstances. Advocating and caring for individuals and communities negatively impacted by racial and social injustice is core to our founding mission as a local, not-for-profit managed care plan.

The COVID-19 pandemic laid bare the stark realities of health inequities. Statistics showed that racial and ethnic minorities were much more likely than whites to contract – and die – from the virus.

Dr. Benjamin Danielson, a respected pediatrician, and former Medical Director of the Odessa Brown Children’s Clinic in Seattle, told a CHPW all-staff meeting in August that the pandemic was “a great revealer.”

“This is a virus that reveals our underlying racism and the disproportionate way it affects different populations across all health markers in this state and across this country,” he said.

‘Not in the same boat’

In part to address these disparities, CHPW donated $230,000 to 23 local organizations that directly serve communities of color and others that have systematically faced greater socioeconomic obstacles to health. These community-based partners help address social determinants of health – conditions where people live, work, learn, and play that affect their overall health and well-being.

“More and more, it has become evident that when it comes to the pandemic and health care broadly, we are all in the same storm but we are not in the same boat,” CEO Leanne Berge said at a virtual check presentation event in September.

“That’s why we are deepening our partnerships with organizations across the state that are extraordinarily committed to increasing access to robust, community-based health care and social supports for people of color.”

Nuestra Casa, a Sunnyside-based organization that works to help immigrant women make positive changes both for their families and the community, was among the donation recipients.

“This funding provided by Community Health Plan of Washington allows Nuestra Casa to offer our team, which has been working non-stop since the beginning of this pandemic, with additional support to care for their own health and their own family needs,” Nuestra Casa Executive Director Caty Padilla told KIMA-TV.

Advocating for Vulnerable Populations

CHPW was founded nearly 30 years ago specifically to provide more equitable access to comprehensive, high-quality health care for historically underserved and under-resourced communities. Our efforts to advance health equity in 2020 extended well beyond monetary donations to community organizations. They also included:

- Support and advocacy for immigrants and refugees

  CHPW and its parent organization, Community Health Network of Washington (CHNW), along with CHC partners, community service organizations, and the Washington Association for Community Health, formed the Immigrant and Refugee Health Alliance, a coalition to support access to health care for immigrants, refugees, and their families in Washington State.

  The initiative included creation of a website, waimmigranthealth.org, as a trusted resource for training materials and information on policies affecting immigrants and refugees.

- Transforming Medicaid

  CHPW, CHNW, and the Washington State Health Care Authority (HCA) continued their collaboration for a second year on developing the next generation of Medicaid models to reduce health disparities. The team is focusing on advancing equity in three key areas: pregnancy care, member experience and access to care, and care for chronic disease with a focus on depression and behavioral health. The work of the CHPW/CHNW/HCA team is part of the Advancing Health Equity Learning Collaborative, an initiative funded by the Robert Wood Johnson Foundation. Ours is just one of seven such teams across the country.

- Multicultural Health Care Distinction

  CHPW was again recognized with the honor of Multicultural Health Care distinction from the National Committee on Quality Assurance (NCQA). CHPW was awarded the distinction in recognition of our excellence in providing culturally and linguistically appropriate services.

New Partnership Connects Members with Social Services

Our members know their health needs better than anyone. Our role is to be their partner in health by listening and making sure they get the care and services they need, whenever they need them. To that end, we forged a partnership with technology company Unite Us to connect members with social services in their communities. By building a public health infrastructure to meet people’s basic needs, Unite Us helps CHPW support care collaboration and coordination, and better enables us to track member outcomes from the clinic to the community.

We launched the Unite Us partnership in King, Pierce, and Snohomish counties and by year’s end expanded it to Spokane and Yakima counties. Under the partnership, CHPW’s social services and care management staff can follow members’ care from health providers to community agencies to ensure it is being delivered seamlessly and that there are no gaps between health and social needs.

One of the first referrals to the new Unite Us platform was a 34-year-old King County member with hypertension, anxiety disorder, and depression. The member was living in temporary housing and had sustained a gunshot wound to one of his legs. He wore a brace and relied on a cane to walk. He spoke little English. He could not afford basic household needs. He did not have a bed or couch and had been sleeping on the floor. He explained that due to all his medical conditions, he was afraid of getting sick from used furniture.

Enter the Unite Us partnership. Initially, community organizations responded that they did not have the capacity to work with our member – CHPW Community Health Worker Lahura Jenkins related. “As I continued to learn more about Unite Us, I would update his referral requests to open options for assistance. Eventually, I started seeing referrals getting accepted.”

Through the Unite Us platform, as well as extensive collaboration with the member’s Community Health Center staff and two dedicated community organizations, the member eventually received a new mattress, box spring, and mattress pad. It was the type of favorable outcome the new partnership was designed to deliver.

"The Unite Us partnership allows CHPW to comprehensively address all the needs of our members with a holistic approach," said Jennifer Polello, CHPW’s Senior Director of Quality and Population Health. "Thanks to this partnership, we can connect our members to the services they need in a timely manner, ultimately improving their overall health and well-being."

Taylor Justice, cofounder and president at Unite Us, said CHPW’s community-based approach “pairs perfectly with our mission of improving the health of communities by connecting local social and health services.”

Community Health Workers Help Bridge the Gap

Social determinants of health (SDoH) are conditions in the environments in which people were born, live, learn, work, play, and age that affect a wide range of health outcomes and risks. One of the ways CHPW addresses SDoH is by helping to coordinate members’ care and link them to community-based resources and support services. Our regionally based Community Health Workers (CHWs) play a pivotal role in that effort. They typically live in the regions they serve and have a deep understanding of their communities.

“Our CHWs advocate for member needs and serve as a liaison/connection between health and social service systems,” said Tashau Asefaw, Manager of Community Programs for CHPW. In 2020, we expanded the reach of our Community Health Worker presence by increasing the number of CHWs in Spokane, Benton, and Franklin counties.

In addition to the staffing increase, we leveraged our CHWs to go out into neighborhoods to locate hard-to-reach members that our case managers were unable to reach by phone. We recognized that at-risk members face many obstacles in accessing care and meeting their basic needs, such as lack of transportation and access to affordable housing.

The goal was to improve health outcomes by providing the members with information about CHPW’s programs, reconnecting them to needed care and case management services, and eliminating barriers to care access.
2020 saw the arrival of Cascade Care, a new health coverage option in Washington State, and CHPW was an integral part of its launch. The goal of Cascade Care is to increase the availability of quality, affordable health coverage in the individual market, targeting Washington residents who fall between Medicaid eligibility and higher-cost commercial coverage.

CHPW was the only health plan to actively support a public option when such legislation was discussed by Washington State lawmakers in 2019.

Community Health Network of Washington, the parent organization of CHPW and partner in this venture, was among five carriers selected to provide first-in-the-nation “public option” plans as part of Cascade Care.

The CHNW-CHPW offering, called CHNW Cascade Select and made available through the Washington Health Benefit Exchange, began enrolling members in nine counties in November, for coverage starting Jan. 1, 2021.

"Now more than ever, people need access to high quality, affordable health care, and Cascade Care offers that,” Gov. Jay Inslee said in a press release at the time. “I am pleased that health insurance companies, hospitals and medical providers have stepped up to offer this innovative coverage option, despite the COVID-19 pandemic. We are building a solid foundation during this first year of the program and anticipate that Cascade Care will offer even more for consumers over time.”

Cascade Care public option plans offer standard benefits and cost-sharing at each of three metal levels – gold, silver, and bronze. The plans are required to meet affordability standards and cap the amount health insurance carriers can pay providers for services.

CHNW-CHPW’s Cascade Select plans are centered around care provided by Community Health Center clinics. They are tailored to individuals and families who do not currently qualify for Medicaid or Medicare and do not receive health insurance through an employer.

The newly awarded regions bring CHPW’s total Apple Health service area to 29 counties across the state.

“Now more than ever, people need access to high quality, affordable health care, and Cascade Care offers that.”

–Governor Jay Inslee

"A welcome return"

CHPW also received approval in 2020 from the Health Care Authority (HCA) to offer our Apple Health (Medicaid) plans in five Washington counties where we formerly had a presence (Pierce, Chelan, Douglas, Grant, and Okanogan), beginning in 2021.

HCA had issued a request for proposals (RFP) to allow managed care plans to expand to areas of the state in which they are not currently active if they had demonstrated successful performance in other regions. The goal was to ensure access to care, particularly for behavioral health services, for Apple Health enrollees during the COVID-19 pandemic and beyond.

Joe Contris, who was tapped as CHPW’s new Regional Manager for the Pierce region, said CHPW will work with area health providers, community-based organizations, and other entities to advance whole-person care and equity for CHPW members.

"CHPW is doing vital work to support residents’ health and well-being and has consistently served as a committed partner dedicated to ensuring that all communities have access to quality health care,” Contris said.

The newly awarded regions bring CHPW’s total Apple Health service area to 29 counties across the state.

“Now more than ever, people need access to high quality, affordable health care, and Cascade Care offers that.”
